When I was young, my mother read me a story about a wicked little girl who had two sisters. One sister was a good girl and she read from the Bible to her mother and she there was a demon in the story. The girl was beautiful and she had a mother who was poor. She sent her daughter to work for the rich people who spoiled and petted her. The rich people told her she had to visit her mother. But the girl felt she was too good and went merely to show herself. One day the rich people sent her home with a loaf of bread for her mother.
But when she came to a muddy path, she slipped and her shoes were soiled with mud. She stepped on a snake into the mud. She was afraid. She ran to a house of demons and demons. Because she was beautiful, the demon queen turned her into a statue as a gift for her great-grandson. The girl was covered in snakes and slugs and surrounded by the hate of every creature. Trapped like she was, she was starving but couldn't eat and still welded to her feet.
She could hear what people were saying about her; a boy passing by saw what had happened to her and told everyone, and they said she deserved it. Her mother said she deserved it. The girl couldn't move, but if she could have, she would've
